Corona Citrus Labels Collection

c. 1880s-1950s

34 textual documents, 80 Citrus Labels, 15 pieces of Ephemera, and 22 Citrus Label Reproductions 1.5 linear feet | 2 boxes

The Corona Citrus Labels Collection is one of the Heritage Room's most prized possessions, and a treasure for any researcher of the citrus industry or late 19th and early 20th century advertising. Southern California citrus growers are credited with inventing the citrus label in the 1880s. The paper labels replaced methods such as stencils, stamps or burned brands on wooden boxes. California packing houses developed a wooden shipping box about 12" x 12" x 27", and used a label about 10" x 11" on the box end. With the advent of the transcontinental railroad and steamship systems, local growers became national growers and the bright, colorful designs became a central component of their marketing system. This standard label size was used for about 70 years, until the mid-1950s when the wooden boxes were replaced by cardboard boxes with pre-printed labels on the box ends.

The images on the labels reflected packing houses own interests. Many featured representations of the California landscape or Spanish images alluding to the history of the area; others emphasized the process of cultivating citrus fruit. Often, images of delicious ripe fruit were placed in the foreground. Though packing houses were in charge of selecting images, most Corona packing houses utilized the services of lithographers in San Francisco and Los Angeles. Many different artists working in Los Angeles and San Francisco contributed to the designs on California labels. Corona's collection alone is illustrative of the many different images and diverse iconography involved in the creation of these advertisements.

Our collection compromises 42% of all known existing Corona citrus labels dating from before 1906 and up until the mid to late 1950s (when the labels were no longer produced). Many of the labels designed and used over the 70 year period no longer exist or are extremely rare. In addition to Citrus Labels, our collection contains ephemera such as juice bottle labels, the tissue used to wrap individual fruit, and various postcards, color copies and other reproductions of citrus labels. The inventories, appraisals, and history concerning Corona Citrus Labels are also part of this manuscript collection.
